At this stage, one of the developmental tasks that must be undertaken is having a romantic relationship, and therefore there are qualities that must be considered in having a romantic relationship. According to the Badan Pusat Statistik, there are twice more women than men who marry in the stage of emerging adulthood. For that reason, this research focuses on women. According to previous research, father involvement is an important factor in determining the child's quality of romantic relationships. The research was conducted quantitatively using the Skala Keterlibatan Ayah and the Quality of Relationship Inventory (QRI) measuring instruments. The results of the first hypothesis showed that there was no correlation and no significant effect of father involvement on support ($r = .164, p = .080; p > .05$). The result of the second hypothesis showed that there was no correlation and significant effect of father involvement on conflict ($r = -.037, p = .698; p > .05$).
