Consulting firms act as strategic partners for clients in formulating and implementing strategies that support business growth, whether through public relations management or innovative marketing campaigns. Effective leadership strategies are key elements in creating a supportive, innovative, and highly competitive work environment in consulting firms. Leaders at Cornelia & Co are required not only to provide strategic direction but also to build mutual trust with their teams. This study aims to examine the influence of Leader Emotional Intelligence, Transformational Leadership, Transactional Leadership, and Work Motivation on Job Performance through Trust in Supervisor. The expected benefit of this research is to enhance knowledge and understanding of management studies, particularly regarding the influence of these variables. The study employs a causal research design using a quantitative approach, with the aid of SmartPLS 3 software to process primary data collected from 47 employees of Cornelia & Co in Yogyakarta. Respondents in this study include males and females aged 18–50 years, working at Cornelia & Co. The results of this study indicate that four variables have a positive and significant influence: Work Motivation on Job Performance, Leader Emotional Intelligence on Trust in Supervisor, Transactional Leadership on Trust in Supervisor, and Work Motivation on Trust in Supervisor.
